Terente Adelphi, Act V. Scene IV.

GENTLEMEN,

Ne: 1990

PERMIT me to address you in a spirit of candour and respect, and under the sacred and endearing names of fellow-citizens and fellow-christians. With intentions not less pure, and, probably, after researches not less diligent than your own, I cannot profess to think with you upon many speculative subjects, both of politics and of religion. But freedom of enquiry is equally open to you, and to myfelf: it is equally laudable in us, when conducted with impartiality and decorum; and it must equally tend to the enlargement of knowledge and the improvement of virtue, while our fincerity does not betray us into precipitation, and while our zeal does not stifle within us the amiable and falutary fentiments of mutual forbearance. Upon the points in which we diffent from each other, argument will always fecure the attention of the wife and good; whereas invective must disgrace the cause which which we may respectively wish to support. But the principles upon which we are agreed, are, furely, of a more exalted rank, and of more extensive importance, than those about which we differ; and while that importance is felt, as well as acknowledged, we shall welcome every argument, and resist every invective, from whatever quarter they may proceed.

We are convinced, I truft, as to the truth and authority of the Scriptures. But in the interpretation of them, we must be fensible, that the imperious and delufive infallibility, which we refuse to others, cannot be claimed by ourfelves. We are fatisfied, I presume, about the wisdom and utility of those fundamental principles that diffinguish the mixed government, under which an indulgent Providence has permitted our forefathers and ourfelves to live. Yet, if one class of men are disposed to uphold the power of the crown, and another, to enlarge the freedom of the people, we have no right to conclude, that the former wish to be fettered with the chains of flavery, or that the latter are preparing to let loofe the ravages of The advocate for monarchy is not necessarily the foe of liberty, nor is the love of liberty incompatible with reverence for monarchy. Experience, indeed, foon puts to flight those chimerical accusations, which issue from the narrow spirit of system, or the frantic vehemence of party. In the hour of trial men cast away subordinate diffinctions, as incumbrances to their understandings, and cleave to some vigorous and solid principle, which arrests their common notice, because it embraces their common interests. They cease to wrangle, when they are called upon to act; and they look back with a mixture of amazement and contempt, even upon themselves, for all the cavils in which their vanity once exulted, and for all the reproaches by which their malignity was once gratified.

Through

Through circumstances which are the result of accident, more than defign, through the prejudices of our education, through the habits of our thinking, through the conversation of our acquaintance, and sometimes, it may be, through the authority of our teachers, difference of opinion will arife. But that difference, when carefully examined, often resolves itself only into a question of more or less, of fit or unfit, as to the time, of proper or improper, as to the mode, of probable or improbable, as to the confequence. It really turns, not upon the actual existence, or upon the general validity of principles themfelves, but upon the degree, in which they are applicable to some specific and controverted case. As, however, the folution of these difficulties must ever be dependent, not only upon the fluctuating nature of all worldly affairs, but upon the many, or the few opportunities we have for obferving their varying aspects, and upon the greater or less ability we employ to comprehend their relations and their effects, there must often be room for suspense of judgment, and there will always be a call for the exercise of charity. On the other hand, impatience of contradiction is both weak and wicked. Instead of facilitating decision, it perpetuates contention. It darkens the evidences, and obstructs the efficacy of truth itself. It originates in a radical defect of judgment, and too often terminates in a most incorrigible intolerance of temper.

I doubt not, Gentlemen, but that you will allow the juftness of these observations. I doubt not, but that you are impressed with a deep sense of their utility. But in the application of them to practice, we all see and we all lament, very frequent instances of inconsistency or reductance even among those persons, who in matters of theory may justly pretend to the fullest information and the clearest conviction.

The fituation, Gentlemen, in which you are placed, attracts the notice of all parties and of all fects in your own country; and the conduct which you may purfue in that fituation, must exalt your characters to honour, or deprefs them with infamy, not only in your own age, but to pofterity. By moderation in your opinions, and by prudence in your measures, you may disarm the prejudices of your enemies, fecure the protection of your governors, and conciliate the favour of the virtuous and the enlightencd. On the contrary, if you swell trifles into bulkiness by a fuperfluous and turbulent zeal, -if you inflame the animofities which you ought to mitigate, -- if you perfevere in a frivolous or a pernicious contest, in which retreat would be lefs inglorious than victory, and victory is lefs probable than overthrow,—the confiderate part of your fellow-citizens will be at a lofs to determine whether you are most to be condemned, for the infatuation of your understandings, or for the perverseness of your dispositions.

You stand, Gentlemen, upon a high and an open theatre, where every action will be vigilantly noticed, and every motive feverely scrutinized. You have more to hope from the stern and folicitous justice, than from the candour or partiality of those, by whom you are observed. You have a very illustrious, and, perhaps, a very difficult part to perform. You are summoned to a triumph, not merely over the prepoficitions of your calumniators, but over the excesses of your own passions. You are to vindicate and preferve your future reputation, by disproving the heavy charges which have been alledged against your past beha-You are to meet acquittal or condemnation, from a most awful tribunal, the sentence of which has been hitherto fuspended, by uncertainty about what you have done, and compassion for what you have suffered. You are to convince a generous, but a difcerning publick, that peace is equally dear to you with liberty, that you have wisdom to concede, where concession is a duty, as well as firmn. so not to relax, where relaxation were a crime, that the doctrinal peculiarities of Unitarianism are persectly compatible with the practical rules of christianity, and that while you applaud the auspicious changes in the French government, you meditate no direct or indirect injury to your own.

These plain but interesting considerations, Gentlemen, are prefented to your view by a man, who has rifqued, and would again rifque, the imputation of fingularity, of indecorum, and even apostacy, by doing to you what is just, and by fpeaking of you what is true. Though he does not profess himself an advocate for many of your tenets, he can, with fincerity, declare himfelf not an enemy to your persons. He knows only few among you, but he thinks well of many. He respects you for temperance and decency in private life. For diligence in your employments, and punctuality in your engagements-for economy without parfimony, and liberality without profusionfor the readiness you shew to relieve distress and to encourage merit, with little or no distinction of party-for the knowledge which many of you have acquired, by the dedication of your leifure hours to intellectual improvement, and for the regularity with which most of you are faid to attend religious worship. As to some late deplorable events, he believes, that you have been mifrepresented -he knows that you have been wronged-he deprecates the continuance of that mifrepresentation, and he now calls upon your judgments, upon your feelings, and upon your consciences, to avert the repetition of those wrongs.

Such, Gentlemen, is the general purpose for which I take the liberty of addressing you; and in the sequel of this pamphlet, you will find me state, without disguise, and without acrimony, my serious opinion upon the particular event which has induced me thus to stand forward, with the zeal, but not the arrogance of a counsellor, and with the fidelity, but not the blindness of a friend.

A report has for some time been circulated in this county, that you intend to commemorate the French Revolution upon the approaching 14th of July. Unwilling I was to believe that report, because I was unable to account for that intention. It feemed to me incredible. that men, harraffed, as you have been, by oppression, and loaded with obloquy, should deliberately rush into danger and difgrace, into danger which you cannot push aside, and difgrace, which, after fuch an action hazarded at fuch a criss, you would in vain endeavour to wipe away. For a time, therefore, I disbelieved, and I resisted the report.-I supposed it to originate merely in conjectures of what you would do, arising from misapprehension of what you had already done.-I ascribed the propagation of it to the busy and mischievous activity of partizans, who are desirous of alarming the ignorant, and of exasperating the prejudiced. I cast it into the common stock of those idle and slanderous rumours, which rife up, we know not where, and difappear, we know not when. I gave you credit for common fense enough to perceive that such a measure at such a time was unlafe, and for common moderation enough to feel that it was unbecoming. In other men I should have called that measure criminal. In you, Gentlemen, I thought it impossible. But if my surprise was great, when I first received the intelligence, how violent must have been the shock, how deep the concern I felt, upon discovering, as I lately have done, that it was too well founded? The primitive christians, in consequence of their invincible fortitude, were by some of their antagonists contemptuoufly named Biæothanati, and by others they were barbarously ridiculed, as homines desperata et deplorata factionis. But they were actuated by an indifputably good spirit in a cause eminently good; in a cause which immediately concerned their duty and their falvation; in a cause. cause, for the defence of which they were compelled to tondergo perfecution, though it does not appear that they were authorifed to court it. But you, Gentlemen, appear to me to be shewing excessive hardiness upon a subject, in which you are remotely and indirectly interested .- You feem to provoke opposition, without an adequate object. I confider you as plunging into calamity, where you have not the plea of discharging a duty. I think, that for the guilt and the mifery into which your enemies may be hurried, the chief responsibility must now recoil upon yourselves.

Permit me, then, to exposulate with you upon the only arguments which you, probably, can produce for afferting again your right to assemble, and at the same time to lay before you the reasons which I, without hefitation and without apology, pronounce it your duty to refrain from the most perilous exercise of that most doubtful right.

It may be faid, that you are not forbidden to meet by the laws of the land, and therefore, that your meeting is irreproachable .-- I admit the fact, but deny the confequence. A good man, doubtlefs, will not do any thing which the laws interdict. But will he therefore do every thing which the laws have not interdicted? Will he not consider, that there is a spirit, as well as a letter, even in human laws? Will he, without discrimination and without restriction, infer the tacit approbation of persons who frame, or persons who administer laws, from the mere absence of direct and specific prohibition? Will he forget, that an external action may fometimes be accompanied by motives and effects, which, if the law-giver had forefeen them, would have met with the most pointed reprobation? Instead of rejoicing that penalties are not instituted of fuch a kind as to become equally fnares to the harmless, and checks upon the froward, will he convert the caution or the lenity of the law-giver into an occasion of disturbing that order, the preservation of which is the supreme and avowed object of law itself? Will he lose fight of the judicious and temperate distinction which the Apostle has established between "things lawful and things not expe-"dient?" Will he not remember, that as a focial and a moral being, he is under the controll of obligations more powerful and more facred than the best institutions of the best government? If, indeed, we examine the aggregate of those duties in which our virtue consists, and of those caufes by which our well-being is promoted, fmall is the thare, which must be assigned to the efficacy of public regulations enforced by the fanctions of public authority. The foft manners of civilized life, the ufeful offices of good neighbourhood, the fweet charities of domestic relation, are all independent of human laws. Such are the opinions which we hold, and have a right to propagate, upon abstract questions of politics. Such are the tenets we may adopt, and are warranted to defend, upon the foundations of virtue and the evidences of religion. Such are our attachments or antipathies to public men; --- fuch, our approbation or disapprobation of public measures. are our fentiments upon the nice gradations of decorum and propriety, --- Such are our principles in estimating the mass of merit or demerit, which determines the character of individuals. Upon all these subjects, human laws hold out to us little light, they impose upon us few restraints. and yet, upon right apprehensions of these subjects, and upon the conformity of our actions to those apprehensions, depend our comfort, our reputation, our most precious interests in this world, and our dearest hopes in that which is to come.

There is not any one action, and scarcely is there any one thought, affecting or tending to affect the happiness of mankind, upon which any one human being is entirely and strictry ftrictly a law unto himself. There is a law of opinion, which no good man will prefume to treat with irreverence, because every good man is anxious to avoid the contempt, and to deserve the regard of his fellow-creatures. There is a law of discretion mingled with justice, which every good citizen is careful to observe, lest he should interrupt the tranquility, or encroach upon the equitable rights of his fellow-citizens—There is a law of religion, which forbids us to insult the errours, or even to wound the prejudices, of our fellow christians.

You, Gentlemen, understand not less clearly than myfelf, the existence of such laws: You will acknowledge their importance, not less sincerely; and you will admit that the perverse or wanton violation of them cannot be extenuated before man—cannot be justified before God, by the plea---yes, I must call it, the futile and fallocious plea, that we are acting under circumstances, where human wisdom is too dim, and human authority too feeble, to controll our actions.

Here, then, a question arises whether the meeting which you intend to hold, does, or does not, fall under the obligation of those laws which I have enumerated, and the neglect or observance of which you must yourselves confess to have a permanent and a visible influence, in preserving or contaminating our innocence, in promoting or impeding our happiness, in entitling us to praise, or in covering us with dishonour. Now, in my opinion, Gentlemen, such a meeting is at variance with your duty as prudent men, with your duty as peaceable citizens, and with your duty as sincere christians.

Many are the fituations in which prudence itself is not only expedient, but obligatory; and in the present state of things, it is not the part of a prudent man for you to do again, what you have already done, with so much loss of your property, and so much danger to your persons. It is not the part of a peaceable citizen, to provoke again those ferocious tempers, and those outrageous crimes, of which you have yourselves so lately and so largely experienced the dismal consequences. It is not the part of a sincer christian, to offend, without some weighty reason, even his weaker brethren. Much less is this part to cast upon the rash and wild decision of passion, those speculative questions, which ought to be decided only by cool and impartial reason. Least of all is it his part, by an unnecessary and unprofitable experiment, prastically to involve thousands in danger, and ten thousands in Guilly.

Well do you know, that, whether justly or unjustly, such an assembly will immediately bring into review your political and your religious notions, to the utmost possible extent, and under the utmost possible disadvantages.—But in vain will you make professions of a general attachment to the laws and constitution of your country, when for so trissing an end, you venture upon such proceedings as will induce other men to transgress those laws, and to maintain that none of you are well affected to that constitution. In vain will you insist upon your sincerity in the belief of the gospel, when you throw snares and temptations in the way of other men, many of whom believe it with the same firmness, and contemplate it with the same reverence.

Be affured, Gentlemen, that I have felt difgust, rather than conviction, difgust, I say, from the reproaches, rather than conviction from the arguments, of certain persons, who would oppress you with the entire, or even the chief responsibility for the events of the last disastrous year. Unlikely it was that you should foresee all those events in all their causes, and all their aggravations. It was unlikely, that you should suspect certain machinations, which are said to have been formed against you in distant quarters.

quarters. It was unlikely, that you should calculate by your foresight, or even by your fears, what you have witnessed by your fenses; I mean, the most unexampled degradation of the national character, the christian character, and the human character. But the plea of ignorance can be urged no longer. Experience has shewn you, what men are, under the tyranny of prejudice; experience has shewn you, what they can be in defiance of law; and if that experience is lost upon your discretion or your humanity, every countenance will blush for your folly, every voice will be raised against your rashness, but for your sufferings, believe me, Gentlemen, for your sufferings, no heart, however tender, will hereafter mourn.

You will fay, perhaps, that the opposition to you arises from narrow prepossessions, from base intrigues, from calumnious reports. Be it fo. But if these evils do really hover around you, it becomes alike your interest and your duty to deliberate calmly upon the most proper and the most effectual methods of counteracting them .-If you are furrounded by numerous enemies, remember, I befeech you, that refistance is fruitless, and that retaliation is vindictive. If you are watched by fecret ruffians, confider, that their machinations will be defeated, while you abitain from those measures, which, upon a late occasion, made them fuccessful. If you are annoyed by venomous flanderers, reflect, that by doing again, what you have done before, you will furnish new materials for new accufations; and that by doing it under new circumflances you will throw around those accusations a more specious appearance, and give them a wider and a more fatal effect.

I mean, not, Gentlemen, to affirm or to deny, that the evils of which you complain, are so great as you represent them. But if I am to suppose them to exist upon the evidence of your own statement, I infer from that very statement.

flatement, the very strongest objections to your own intended conduct.

In the town where you refide, there are many perfons, whose talents and whose virtues deserve your esteem, however widely they may diffent from you upon numberless questions, about which free enquirers into truth, and the inhabitants of a free country, ever have differed, and ever will differ. These men do not listen with a willing ear, when your reputations are rudely attacked. Their bosoms are not callous, while they reflect upon those melancholy scenes, when your families were forced from their homes, when your property was plundered, when your houses were confumed in a conflagration which deepened the horrours of the night, and drove back even the folendour of the sun in open day. But, if you meet again, the candid doubts of these men, as to the intention of your former meeting, will be supplanted by indignant suspicions, and their pity for your former fufferings will be exchanged for difgust and abhorrence.

I meddle not with the controverfy going on between Dr. Priestley and the clergy of your town, so far as it relates to those circumstances which preceded, or those which followed the riots-But those clergymen have professed openly and unanimously to lament the misfortunes which befel you. They have condemned the tumultuous and favage proceedings of a mifguided rabble. They have afferted with firmness their own opinions, and with fincerity, I would hope, they have disclaimed all right of controul over yours. To some of them you are indebted for well-intended exertions in the hour of diffress, and against none have you brought any accusations, for encouraging the popular fury at that juncture, when the act of encouraging it would have been most difgraceful, indeed, to them, but most injurious to yourselves. Individually, as you well well know, one of them is much respected for the depth of his learning, another, for the elegance of his manners, a third, for the cheerfulnes of his temper, and a fourth, for the liberality of his spirit. In a collective point of view, they are men who draw down no disgrace upon their facred profession, either by the neglect of their clerical offices, or by slagrant indecorum, or by habitual vice. Give them the credit, then, I beseech you, of having some regard for the honour of the church to which they belong, for the tranquility of the town in which they live, for the fafety even of the congregations which they are not employed to instruct, and above all, let me add, for the morals and the souls of multitudes, who are committed to their charge.

By fermons or controverfial writings, they have bereaved you, it will be faid, eventually of those precepts which you have been accustomed to hear, and of that example which you have been accustomed to admire, in a most venerable preacher, for whom it is no longer safe to prefide over a flock, endeared to him by ancient habits of familiarity, and connected with him by many personal, many political, and many religious ties. Into the truth of this allegation, it were invidious and impertinent for me to enquire. But the scriptures, you will consider, still lie open to you. The house in which you did homage to your Creator will foon be rebuilt.-The fame freedom which you formerly enjoyed in opinion and in worthip, is at this hour fecured to you, by the laws; and though you cannot again obtain the honour and advantage you derived from such an instructor as Dr. Priestley, your sect is nardly fo barren of excellence, as not to fupply you with a fuccessor, whose talents, indeed, may be less flattering to your honest pride, but whose labours will not be less meritorious in discharging the duties of his clerical station, nor less instrumental in making all of you "wife unto falvation."

I should

I should not think well of your sensibility, if you were indifferent to the loss of so excellent a preacher as Dr. Priestley.---But I shall think very ill of your moderation, if you make that loss a pretext for perpetuating disputes, which if my arguments or my prayers could prevail, would speedily have an end.

Upon the theological disputes in which the Doctor has been engaged with fome clergymen of your town, I forbear to give any opinion. Yet, while I disclaim all allusion to local events, I will make you a concession which you have my leave to apply to perfons of higher ranks as ecclefiastics, and of greater celebrity as scholars, than your town can supply—that in too many instances such modes of defence have been used against this formidable Herefiarch, as would hardly be justifiable in the support of revelation itself, against the arrogance of a Bolingbroke, the buffoonery of a Mandeville, and the levity of a Voltaire. But the cause of orthodoxy requires not such aids - The Church of England approves them not-The spirit of christianity warrants them not. Let Dr. Priestley, indeed, be confuted, where he is mistaken. Let him be expered, where he is superficial. Let him be repressed, where he is dogmatical. Let him be rebuked, where he is cenforious. But let not his attainments be depreciated, because they are numerous almost without a parallel. Let not his talents be ridiculed, because they are superlatively great. Let not his morals be vilified, because they are correct without aufterity, and exemplary without oftentation, because they present even to common observers, the innocence of a Hermit, and the simplicity of a Patriarch, and because a philosophic eye will at once discover in them, the deep-fixed root of virtuous principle, and the folid trunk of virtuous habit.

If I missake not the character of that excellent man, whom I respect in common with yourselves, he would not wish to fee you again plunged into mischiefs, which cannot again reach himself.—Spare then bis bluthes, and bis tears --- Give him the satisfaction of knowing, that you have proved to the world, the wholesome efficacy of his infructions, by your generosity in forgiving those who have already been your enemies, and by your wisdom in not offending those, who wish to continue your friends.

About the effects of your intended meeting there can be little doubt; nay I should rather affirm, that there can be no doubt, but that the effects will be far more tremendous than the effects of your former meeting, and I ground these positions, not only upon the general characters of men, but upon some particular events, which among yourselves have been subjects of complaint.

The age in which we live is diffinguished not only for an active and ufeful fpirit of enquiry, but by a fastidious and fantaffic turn of mind, which fooths us into felf-approbation while we deplore furrounding evils, and contemplate distant good. I say not that these illusions may not fometimes prepare us for virtuous action, when opportunities for acting exist. But I fear that in too many cases, the imagination is indulged, while the heart is not improved. Upon topics relating to public as well as private life, in studying speculative politics as well as in reading fentimental novels, we are often the dupes of fecret vanity, and applaud ourselves for ideal or inactive philanthropy. When no intercst is to be renounced, no passion to be curbed, no froward humour to be thwarted, we embrace truth, wherefoever we find it, and in theory become the warm and strenuous advocates of virtue. But in practice, our exertions fall very fhort of the rules we have prefcribed to ourselves and to our fellow-creatures, and though we are really invested with the power of doing good, we either neglect to do it at all, or we are content to do it with that reluctance and languor which we have been accustomed to condemn in other men. Prepossessions blind us---Antipathies harden us---Passion hurries us into faults, and self-dehnsion foon provides us with an excuse. Now, Gentlemen, as many of your teachers are eminent for having contributed to the general stock of knowledge, and as you are yourselves distinguished by an eagerness to defend and to propagate it, beware lest the want of consistency should lead men to charge upon you the want of sincerity.

You and I must often have looked with forrow upon the fituation of the poor, pinched as they are by want, exposed to delusion, mortified by neglect, irritated by oppreffion, bewildered in the mazes of error, and involved in the darkness of ignorance. And is it a proof then, of your compassion for their miseries, or of your solicitude for their improvement, that knowing the lower classes of your townsmen to be still under the dominion of the same unhappy prejudices, you will again provoke them to the fame horrible excesses? I lament, Gentlemen, the unhappy end of those wretches, who suffered for the riots; and can it be your wish, that the dreadful severity of the laws should be inflicted again? The publick feems not perfectly fatisfied with the acquittal of fome perfons, who, by means known or unknown, honourable or dishonourable, were rescued from punishment. But is it a mark of your reverence for the laws, that you would again cause them to be evaded, and infulted by evafion? Will Juries, think ye, be more impartial between the profecutor and the prifoner? Will Judges be more favourable to the one? Will the Sovereign be more rigourous towards the other? No. No. They will fee obstinacy hereafter, where they before might only fee indifcretion. They will confider you as meeting in defiance of common opinion-as rifquing a great and a certain evil, for a very uncertain and a very trifling good; -as exposing your houses, your persons, and your families, without the impulse of provocation, and without the profpect of advantage—as calling for justice, upon those whom you have yourselves precipitated into crimes—as staking the pleasures of one afternoon's entertainment, or the exercise of one petty right, against WHAT? against laws which, you know, will be transgressed—against lives which, you know, will be forseited—against the credit of yourselves, and of others who may hold the same political opinions with yourselves—against the counsel of the wise, the arguments of the moderate, and the entreaties of the humane—Against the safety of your houses and your children—against the judgment and the quiet of your neighbours—against the property and the persons of all the various inhabitants of a great and a prosperous town.

Under fuch circumstances, Gentlemen, --- circumstances, which you cannot but yourselves foresee---circumstances, of which you, probably, have been informed by other men---circumstances, of which you are now most solemnly forewarned by me, What, let me ask you, can be your claims upon the juffice or upon the compaffion of your countrymen? In point of law, you may be entitled to protection and redress. But in point of common sense, you ought to fee, that fuch protection will be reluctant, and that fuch redrefs will be fearty. After a fecond meeting, you will experience many galling mortifications from which you hitherto have been free. Your cause will no longer be the cause of men "who seek peace and ensue it." Your fufferings will not be the fufferings of perfecuted innocence. Your dishonour will be extensive, it will be lasting, it will be just,

I befeech you, Gentlemen, when you read the foregoing fentences, not to misconceive the temper in which they are written, not to confound the earnestness of remonstrance with the fierceness of accusation, not to turn away from me as a declamatory prattler, nor to frown upon me as a virulent calumniator, but to listen to me, I had almost said, as a prophet, and I do say, as a friend.

B 3 Your

Your own good fense will, I am persuaded, tell you, that upon the circumstances of the agent must often depend the quality of the action. And give me leave to observe, that the circumstances, in which you are placed, are such as merit the most ferious consideration from you, as individuals, as partizans, as fubjects who owe obedience to your government, and as citizens who with for an enlargement of your liberties. Look around, I conjure you, at the storm which is gathering in every part of Europe-at the dangers which impend over the new constitution of France, and at the alarm which has foread, and daily is foreading more and more, throughout the British empire. The tenets of Mr. Paine, most of which I despise as vulgar, and deteft as feditious, are gaining ground among the ignorant and discontented. The sears of moderate, and sensible men, too, are awakened by those opinions. The indignation of good men is stirred up against them—The wisdom of parliament has unanimously pronounced a sentence of reprobation upon their principles. The vigilance of government is pointed, and its firength, too, I hope, is armed against their possible effects. Surely, then, I need not expatiate upon the probability that your meeting will, by many well-meaning and well-informed men, be affociated with the very tenets which Mr. Paine is endeavouring to propagate; and if this be the case, the publick voice may pronounce a late parliamentary decision very just, though, in the estimation of many intelligent individuals, it is now confidered as harsh .- If you persist in your resolution to affemble, what you may reafenably hope, will be refused to you in confequence of the apprehensions which will be entertained of what you most unreasonably meditate. Perilous it will be thought to grant, and fruitless even to discuss, that which you openly claim, while you raife up against yourfelves a fwarm of fuspicions, about that which you fecretly intend. If therefore, you really with to be relieved from the preffure of those rigorous acts which hang over the heads of Unitarians, do not frighten benevolent and loyal men from from becoming your advocates. Do not fuffer your religious tenets to be confounded with the feeming tendency of your political opinions united with your political actions. Do not furnish a triumph to those, who have hitherto infulted you, perhaps, without a caufe, and cenfured you without a proof. The justice of your claims, depend upon it, will at this moment be measured by the violence, or the calmness of your proceedings: And from your meeting, after what you have experienced, it will be inferred, that inflead of meaning folely to celebrate the French Revolution, you are not unwilling to encourage fuch notions, and to excite fuch diforders, as eventually may accelerate a Revolution among ourfelves.-Far, very far, be it from me to charge you with fuch an intention; and far, also, be it from me to slight the terrours, or to condemn the indignation of other men, whom your future conduct after the events of last year, and during the appearances of the prefent, may induce to load you with fuch an imputation. If, therefore, you are friends to order, as I believe, you are, endeavour to preferve it .- If you are enemies to excessive innovations, abstain from the very appearance of promoting them. If you wish for the favour of government, and the approbation of your fellow citizens, let not a dinner, or the right of eating a dinner, upon a certain day, or in a certain place, be thought too confiderable a facrifice for the attainment of these substantial and permanent advantages. Gentlemen, for peculiar and obvious reasons, you cannot avail yourselves of a plea which fome men have urged in your favour. I will lay it before you, and then I will tell you why you cannot avail yourselves of it. If other men dine, as they probably will in other places to commemorate the French Revolution, why may not you do the fame thing with the fame impunity? Confider, I entreat you, the motto which is prefixed to this pamphlet-In appearance non diffimilis reseft; I grant it to be fo-But then the circumstances of him qui facit, must be taken into the account. There is not, if I may believe your own representations, so strong a spirit of intolerance in many other places, as for fome time past has reigned at Birmingham. There have not been riots in other places, as there have been at Birmingham. There have not been civil profecutions, and criminal profecutions in other places, as there have been in this county against the inhabitants of Birmingham. The fame fuspicions are not entertained of other men in other places, as are entertained of you at Birmingham. The fame restraints do not exist upon the disposition of other men to hold a second meeting in other places, which now do exist at Birmingham. My wishes are, that no such meetings may be holden in any place, because they are useless to the reformers of France, and offensive to many worthy men at home. But with whatever propriety and whatever effect they may be holden in other places, the action is not the fame in your town, because, as I have told you, the fituation of the agents is not the fame.

When the folly or the wifdom of man has arbitrarily connected certain figns with certain overt-acts, they who know, as you do, the connection between the fign and the thing fignified, will in vain attempt to fever them by the fubtilties of difcrimination, or the confidence of denial. I fee no necessary union between the tenets of Unitarianism and very enlarged notions of political liberty. But the fast is, that both are to be found in the fame men, and when the passions of ignorant persons are once inflamed, their imagination will pass by a rapid transition from one to the other, and the odium which is cast upon your religion, will rebound upon your politics. In a general way of statement, I should not at first have a doubt. why they who affembled together quietly and parted foon last year, should not do the same in the present year: and I am perfuaded, that it is your inclination to do the fame-But the prejudices and the apprehensions of your neighbours, will not permit you to do fo, and because you are all perfectly feetly fensible of the terrible effects which must arise from fuch prejudices and apprehensions, my cool and settled judgment is, that you are responsible for such effects .- You. perhaps, will plead, that you did no harm and meant no harm-but there will be numbers ready to reply, that trifling actions have and are intended to have momentous effects, that he who defaced the Emperor's statue, was justly punished, because he meant an indirect indignity to the Emperor himself, that so much ardour, and so much perfeverance would not be shewn in commemorating the French Revolution, if they were not mingled with fecret wishes for similar events in a nearer quarter. Gentlemen, I would not infinuate, that you have fuch wishes --- I believe that all or the greater part of you never harboured them for one moment---But they who live in your neighbourhood, and who will fit in judgment upon your meafures, may not deliver a fentence quite fo favourable as my own; and where you have fo little chance of justice, why will you expose yourselves to flagrant and inevitable inustice?

What, I befeech you, can be the end you propose to yourselves in this entertainment? To indulge in revelry and intemperance cannot be the end, for your characters are marked by the opposite virtues of sobriety and regularity. It cannot be to proclaim your fentiments about the Revolution in France, for they are already known, and already reprobated, too, by those to whom they are imperfectly known. It cannot be to multiply converts, for conversion is rarely effected by the unpopular meetings of unpopular men. It cannot be to affert your freedom of thinking upon a fubject, where for better purposes than meeting at a dinner you are already free. Study, if you pleafe, the French Revolution in your closets, discuss the principles and the detail of it in your conversation, explain them when misconceived, defend them when misreprefented. Celebrate, if you pleafe, the glorious destruction of the Bastile in your own private houses---pour forth your praifes praifes upon the framers and the supporters of the French government—Lift up your prayers to heaven for the final success of the French arms—All this, Gentlemen, will be allowed to you, not only by the laws of the land, but by the laws of opinion. No peaceable man will, for this, condemn you. In this, many enlightened men will sympathize with you. But if you have so little regard for the loyal sentiments, or even the rooted prejudices of your neighbours, so little feeling about your own personal security, so little respect for the general approbation of your countrymen, so little caution in the critical state of your country itself, as in defiance of reproach and in defiance of persecution, to assemble again; where is the man of virtue, who can approve of your cause, or where the man of wisdom, who can be fatissied with your excuse?

It may be fuggested, that for not assembling, as you meant to do, you will be charged with dastardly submission. But by wbom, Gentlemen, will this charge be alledged? Sure I am that it never will proceed from men, of found wisdom, and of pure honour, to whose sentence it becomes you to make your first and your last appeal. From whom then will it proceed? From silly men whom you ought to despise, from impetuous men whom you ought only to pity and to restrain, or from factious men whom you ought not to imitate. But what, after all, do we discover in this term submission, which seems to delude and to scare so large a part of mankind? One being, indeed there is, whom a poet of your own country has thus described in language most luminous and most sublime.

[&]quot;Is there no place for pardon left?

[&]quot; None left but by fubmission, and that word

[&]quot;Difdain forbids me, and the dread of shame

[&]quot; Among the spirits beneath, whom I seduced

[&]quot;With other promifes and other vaunts

[&]quot;Than to fubmit."

True it is of too many reasonable creatures, and too many nominal christians, that even they are fometimes driven onward to perdition and to infamy, by this infernal spirit of false pride, false courage, and imaginary fidelity to a bad or a doubtful cause. But God forbid that I should impute to you fuch a spirit, or discover in you even the flightest vestiges of such a spirit. I cannot suspect you of fuch fatuity, as to be pledged for holding a fecond affembly-I will not accuse you of such phrenzy as to redeem your pledge, by the loss of your reputation, or by the hazard of your existence. To whom, also, Gentlemen, is this tribute to be now paid by yourselves? Grant that it were, to a violent rabble whom you can neither appeafe nor refift-fubmiffion would be an act of confummate prudence. Suppose that it were to the excessive, but I will not add the dishonest prejudices of encinies and toriesfubmission would then approach to the dignity of virtue .----But if it were, as in reality it is, to be paid to the wishes of your friends, to the safety of your relations, to the good order of your town, and to the general tranquillity of your country, Then, doubtless, submission rises into a real virtue, into a virtue of the first magnitude, into a virtue of the brightest splendour. Its nature cannot be mifunderstood---its motive cannot be traduced-it will be imputed to magnanimity, --- it will be crowned with praife. Farther let me ask, what is the facrifice that you are making by fuch fubmission? Is it any political opinion? No. Is it any religious tenet? No. Is it any fecular interest? No. It is a dinner, Gentlemen, it is only a dinner, and when I reflect upon the trifle it is in itself, or upon the applause you will gain by renouncing it, or upon the danger you will incur by contending for it, I will not offer fuch an indignity to your good fense, as to press this part of the subject with one word more of illustration or remonstrance.

Gentlemen, in the intention of your friends, and in the conduct of your enemies, you will find precedents, such as will justify the relinquishment of your purpose, or I should rather say, examples, such as will exclude your perseverance in it from justification.

If I am to believe Mr. Dadley, feveral respectable Diffenters last year were disposed to give up their meeting, left the town should be disturbed. If I am to believe your clergy, the propofal for affembling at a publick dinner in opposition to yours, was abandoned at the same critical time for the fame weighty reason. But if some of your friends, and some of your foes shewed so much attention to the quiet of your town, when the temper of the common people was known imperfectly, and by mere conjecture, it is incumbent upon you, to shew more attention to the prescription of that quiet, when the violence of that temper is known to you completely and by melancholy experience. If the Church and King party then understood their real dignity, and preferved it by receding from an ideal, or an imperfect right, let it not be faid of the Diffenters, that with fuch an inftructive example before them, they now infult the very persons by whom they were not themselves insulted-that they are more defirous to incur the censure, than to merit the approbation even of their oponents-that they mistake contumacy for firmness, and rashness for heroism. If churchmen shrunk from the guilt of hurting a party, let Dissenters shudder at the greater guilt of embroiling a nation!

There is, I confefs, one plaufible argument which hitherto has been untouched. I will flate it for you flrongly, and fairly I will answer it. They, whom you suppose, whether justly or unjustly, to be your enemies, have instituted a fociety under the appellation of the Church and King club, and the tendency, you say, of that society is to encrease and to perpetuate the odium which has been excited against against you. Gentlemen, I see little in the tendency of that fociety which as a friend to the quiet of my neighbourhood, or to the civil and ecclefiaftical conftitution of this land. I can reasonably commend. But I also see nothing in the proceedings or the professions of that society, which can possibly justify you for meeting upon the fourteenth of July. Let me again remind you of my motto.-They affemble, and you affemble. But the persons affembling are different, and though it may be faid with truth, that while their purpose is to support government, yours is not to weaken it, Still, Gentlemen, there are many circumstances which will lead to very different constructions, of affemblies which in appearance, and in appearance only, are the fame. You meet to celebrate the French revolution, which they certainly do They meet, perhaps, to discourage an English revolution, which as certainly you do not. Their cause is popular in the town, and yours is not. A precedent, then, their affembly cannot be called for yours, and I am equally at a loss to discover, how it should be a justification.

Were I to grant you that they meet very often, and were I ex hypothes, to grant yet farther, that the spirit with which they meet is not very friendly to you, I am still unable to find in their conduct an apology for yours. majority of the town, in all probability, views their meeting with a favourable eye---But the minority have nothing to fear from it, while their own behaviour is circumspect and temperate. Many persons may be unwilling to believe that a system of unrelenting opposition is intended to be carried on against the Dissenters. Nay I am myself disposed to hope, that not one member of that club, can ferioufly wish to fee your persons again in danger, or your houses in flames. But whatever may be their intention, and whatever their wishes, still it is in your power to counteract them by refraining from that perilous measure, which it is the purpose of this address to reprobate and to prevent. By forbearing to meet only for one day, upon your own parts, you may defeat defeat the collective ftratagems, and the collected malignity of many meetings upon theirs. This observation I ground even upon your own statement, for be it remembered, that it is you, not myfelf, who accuse them of such stratagems and fuch malignity. If they are innocent, I congratulate them. But if they are guilty, I shall not acquit you, because the proof of that guilt must be accompanied by circumftances which may equally tend to difgrace both you and them. They, Gentlemen, even if they have not a better cause, may bring forward a stronger plea. They may contend, that the spirit which they have long observed and long refifted in you, is not yet fubdued, that it rifes fuperior to difficulty and danger, that it challenges, instead of shunning perfecution, that it has incited opposition by past appearances, and that by realities avowed at the prefent hour, fuch opposition is amply and notoriously justified. Whether or no, I should myself admit, either the sincerity or the validity of this reason, is of no consequence-It is sufficient for my purpose that they are likely to employ it, and that you may not be able entirely to refute it.

Reflect, then, I intreat you, upon the aggravated mifchiefs which must flow from the measure you are said to intend, and confider that you become yourselves strictly and immediately answerable for the whole extent of those mischiefs, if you distinctly foresee them, and foreseeing them are unalterably determined to provoke them. -There are fituations in which events become fo probable, as to carry with them all the evidences, and to draw after them all the moral obligations of practical certainty. There are causes, which, however trifling or harmless in the common course of the world, may from temporary or local circumstances be pregnant with the most baneful effects. But when those effects may be justly apprehended, they cannot be innecently hazarded. The club of which you complain, may have been at the expense of much trouble in collecting the gunpowder, and of much contrivance in laving laying the train. But it is you, Gentlemen, who apply the fire to it; and upon whom the explosion may fall, Oh! consider this! upon whom the explosion may fall, can be known only to that Being who "feeth events afar off".

If fenseless prepossessions or merciless animosities still prevail among you, can it be supposed that a meeting on the fourteenth of July will either correct the one, or assuage the other? No. But by forbearing to assemble, you will at least hold out to the publick a bright and unequivocal proof, that prejudices and animosities aught from beneeforth to subside.

It is chiefly from your own representation of your own cause, that I inser the certainty and the greatness of your own danger. If too many oftenders were acquitted upon trial, or too sew were punished after condemnation, the terrours of the law are diminished among the lower classes of the community. If the damages allowed you upon your late prosecutions, were too little, you must in future look even for less. They who attacked you before, will, certainly, not be intimidated from attacking you now. They who hated you upon the bare suspicion of a turbulent temper or of an unbecoming behaviour, will not cease to hate you, after proceedings which, in their judgments, will constitute a decisive proof both of the one and of the other.

Since the late riots, there has been little appearance of actual reconciliation, or indeed of the flighteft dispositions in any of the contending parties to be reconciled. After the lapse of many months, we have heard only of crimination and recrimination, of what you intended to do, and what your enemies bave done, of justice, which, as you say, has been imperfectly dispensed to you, and which, as others say, has been dispensed even beyond your deserts. These different statements affect differently the publick mind. But however divided that publick may be upon past events, it will have one judgment, one seeling and one voice, if in contempt of the very plainest and very worst consequences, you do again, what I believe you to have done before, without any sense of guilt, without any intention of committing injury, and without any certain prospect of being injured. A second meeting will avert from you the good opinion, and the good wishes of those who distained to join in the clamours that were raised against your first, and this consideration alone you ought not to neglect. Even if a riot should not happen to sweep away your property, still your reputation will be stigmatized on account of such steps as tend to provoke a riot.

There are many persons who believe the causes of the late riots to be very deep: many, who have wondered at your vehemence in complaint, when compared with your supineness in action: many, who have been taught to suppose you in possession of stubborn proofs against persons generally unknown or generally unsuspected; many who feel a strong mixture of amazement and scorn, that those boafted proofs have not been brought into open day, for the fatisfaction of the doubtful, the confutation of the malevolent, and the conviction of the guilty. The suppression of these proofs, if such they be, impartial men are at a loss to reconcile to the known motives and the known tenour of human conduct. They cannot reconcile it to your declarations of having obtained evidence, and to your menaces of inflicting punishment. They cannot reconcile it to the reliance you are reported to have upon the protection and the advice of administration, or to the confidence you profess to feel in the justice of your cause. But if you persist in sheltering those whom you have already accused, and then proceed to irritate those whom you may accuse hereafter, most difficult will it be for you to explain these seeming inconsistencies upon any received principles of upright intention. The unprejudiced observer observer will be confounded and offended at so much obfcurity combined with fo much precipitation. The airy witling will exclaim, that however you may reject mysteries in matters of faith, you retain them in matters of practice. Gentlemen, you will excuse me for expostulating with fo much freedom. Often have I condemned the violence of your perfecutors, and the afperity of your accusers—I have lamented, almost as often, a want of opennels or a want of firmnels* in some respectable persons among yourselves. But if you venture to rush upon new dangers, instead of overwhelming with difgrace the real and fecret authors of your past sufferings, I must think your temerity greater than your fortitude-I must, in refpect to the strength of your charges, substitute distrust for belief-In regard to the motives of your conduct, I must exchange apology for condemnation.

The foregoing confiderations I chiefly address to your prudence. But there yet remain other and weightier matters, which I must hold up, at once, to your prudence, and to your conscience. Let me then entreat, that you would feriously throw back your attention upon what is past, and that with equal seriousness, you would consider what is about to come.

In the past you have seen your furniture plundered---your papers risled---your houses destroyed, by an unthink-

* Some observations in this paragraph are in part obviated by the judicious, though ineffectual, attempt which Mr. Whitbread has lately made to bring the subject of the riots before the legislature. But the very application of the Distenters for redress of past injuries, constitutes, furely an additional and a most powerful reason for their future circumspection. It will appear to many persons, a trick upon the justice, and an affront to the authority of parliament, for men to ask for protection, at the very moment in which they are hurrying to the precipice of destruction unnecessarily, voluntarily, and, therefore, criminally. Though parliament, may have been wrong in refusing an enquiry, the Disserters at Birmingham cannot be right in adopting such measures as must prevent that enquiry from being resumed with propriety, and pursued with success.

ing and an unfeeling multitude. But the evils to come, I fay it again, the evils to come will be more numerous in their immediate, and more baneful in their ultimate confequences. The unruly passions of the contending parties have been inflamed by many diffant, and by fome recent events. The blood of those who have perished, in what the vulgar think a righteous cause, will, from the vulgar, call aloud for expiation. The mischiess which burst out suddenly, and raged wildly, in a former year, will in the prefent year be arrayed with circumstances of hideous preparation. Among yourseives, probably, difmay will not, again, chain down refentment. Among your enemies, fresh and greater provocations will be followed up by fresh and greater outrages-Violence will be repelled by violence....Life will be staked against life --- The fire which falls upon your own houses, will spread to the houses of your offending and unoffending townsmen. The havock which breaks out in one town, will, in one or two days, pour its fury through the whole neighbourhood---What shoots up a tumult in one county, may in one month, or even in one week, grow into a REBELLION through a whole kingdom.

Be not in haste, Gentlemen, to impute these representations to the colouring of a heated imagination, rather then to the distates of sober reason. More worthy would it be of your understandings to reslect upon the probability, and magnitude of the disasters which I have decribed; and more would it redound to the praise of your moveration to avoid all share in the guilt of such measures, as unquestionably are likely to produce such disasters.

It is the common refuge of detected folly, or difappointed obitinacy to fay that men first predict evils, because they wish them to come to pass, and then cause them to come to pass, by the alarm which accompanies prediction. But for my part, Gentlemen, I disdain to meet such trite and contemptible sophistry, with the solemnity of denial, or the formalities formalities of refutation. It is condescension enough, and more than enough, to notice an objection, which the weakest man among you is incapable of believing, and which the hardiest man among you would be unwilling to utter concerning myfelf. Whether I were to publish or to suppress these well-meant suggestions, the loyalis's at Birmingham will be displeased at your meeting, the rabble will be incenfed at your meeting, and the foldiers might catch the general contagion. By suppressing my pamphlet, I might leave you to indulge the delutive hope of escaping opposition, or of quelling it. But by publishing that pamphlet, I may awaken in you the wife and virtuous resolution of not deserving to be opposed. Amidst the reports, then, which I hear of your defign, and the prospect which I have of your danger, I cannot hefitate for one moment between the two alternatives. Expostulation, at the worst, were only a weakness, but silence must be a crime.

You will believe me not very indifferent about the fubject upon which I address you, when I say that the intention of writing this pamphlet was formed on Sunday night last, in consequence of some intelligence which then reached me, and that the act of writing it was begun and finished in the course of the next day. But after bestowing upon the contents two revifals. I found very little which it was then of importance for me to add to the preceding parts of this address, and nothing which it was necessary for me to omit, or even to foften. I, therefore, without farther delay fent the manufcript to prefs; for as the matter was fo intelligible and fo interesting, I would not affront your understandings by lavishing decoration upon the stele. Suspect me not of any intention, to alter or to sife your opinions about the French revolution. Many parts of that revolution I myfelf approve, after calm and ferious examination. But no one part of it would I eagerly adopt as a model for imitation in this country. To me it feems fafe and wife to wait for those gradual changes, which the spirit of freedom, enlightened as it must be by French experiments, whether they be immediately fuccefsful, or fruitlefs, and invigorated as it will be by French arms, whether they be victorious or defeated, will most affuredly produce in the temper of every government, and in the judgment of every people.

Within a few days after this book had been cemmitted to the prefs, some events burst forth, which ought, I am fure, to drive you from your present purpose, and to encrease your future circumspection. The precaution of reading the riot act, which most unpardonably was net taken to protect your houses of worship and your dwelling houses, has been taken very feafonably for the protection of Brothel Houses. The military force which in confequence of proper information given in proper time to proper persons, ought to have been on the spot to prevent the riots in July, 1791, fortunately was at hand to suppress the riots of May, 1792. But whether the magistrates would be equally active, or the foldiers equally zealous, in defending you from confequences which you certainly must have foreseen, and easily might have avoided, are points, upon which your doubts, probably, are gloomier than my own. And can you then, conceive a fituation more humiliating, than that in the hour of diffrefs, confcientious Unitarians should be thought lefs worthy of succour than the shameless prostitute, the desperate bully, and the execrable procurefs?

Narrow must have been the foresight, and rooted must have been the prejudices of those persons who could either think with indifference, or talk with exultation of the disturbances by which, in the course of last year, the national police and the national character were alike disgraced. For reasons which at once excite the compassion of the benevolent, and call for the vigilance of the powerful, the lower classes of every community, are in every age, too prone to violence. Permitted I must be to add, with my usual openness, though without any intentional rudeness to you or to your opponents, that in Birmingham there are many physical and moral, many latent and prominent, many inveterate and recent causes by which the passions of your inferiors are become more ferocious than in other towns of equal or fuperior magnitude. To men of ferious and impartial observation it is unnecessary for me to point out those causes, and to the superficial or the captious they would be pointed out in vain---Intense labour succeeded by frequent and fystematic intervals of idleness and intemperance-Political animofities in those who have not even a glimmering of political knowledge-Religious antipathies among those who attend not religious worship -Inflammatory pamphlets and corrupt examples --- The expectation of that impunity which has already been obtained for Rio ers - The idea of merit to Government strangely affociated with the commission of crimes against law .-- Thefe, Gentlemen, are circumftances which peculiarly diffinguish the condition of your common people--which loudly demand fuch exertions as, I truft, will hereafter be made by their spiritual instructors-and which more especially require such caution, delicacy, and moderation, as, I hope, will not be neglected by yourselves. In alluding to these circumstances, I mean not to insult the poor-Many a tear have I shed for their forrows, and many a plea have I framed for their faults-Rather would I preferve their innocence, than defiroy their lives-I would rather fee them enlightened and foftened by the law of God, than scourged and crushed by the laws of man --- My compassion is due to the poor, but my indignation is referved for those wretches by whom the poor are deluded or inflamed.

It is a trite maxim, that the mass of the people, however weakly they may reason, are capable of feeling justly. But the missortune is, that when they have proceeded to act, they seldom continue to feel, or that their feelings are at once excessive in degree, and criminal in kind. Hence in the support of a favourite cause, no enquiry is made about the point where right terminates, and wrong begins. Humanity is then extinguished by zeal, and zeal is alike encreased by triumph and by defeat. After our habitual reverence for the rights of individuals and the laws of a country is overcome by temporary circumstances, and the spirit of misrule has once burst its bonds, every slight rumour, every sudden misconception, every allurement from-immediate advantage, every provocation from seeming hostility, will be sufficient to change its direction, without diminishing its vigour. The passions of the multitude are fickle as well as impetuous; or if exempt, in some particular cases, from fickleness, they become more untameable from stubbornness.

That fury which a great provocation has lately turned against the corrupters of good morals, may by a less provocation, be pointed with yet greater violence against the followers of an unpopular religion, and before its strength is fpent in the extirpation of Diffenters, it may fuddenly be hurried by the luft of rapine, or even by the mere wantonness of success, into outrage against Churchmen. All parties, therefore, and all feets, are equally interested in discouraging this propenfity to riot, by perfusiion, in repressing it by refistance, and in averting it by an inoffensive, temperate, and amicable behaviour. Uncandid it were, indeed, to suppose that Churchmen will not be roufed by a fenfe of danger to a fense of duty. It were equally uncharitable to believe, that finding the fame turbulent disposition still raging among the fame mifguided populace, Diffenters will shew themselves infensible to every danger, and regardless of every duty. The cry of Church and King has, you know, been lately heard in broken and indistinct murmurs, and if you meet again to commemorate the French revolution, that cry will again thunder in your ears, when the florm of public indignation is collested to one point, and when they upon whom it falls with the furest aim and with the greatest force, will be left to perish without refuge and without hope.

It is for you, Gentlemen, and not for myfelf, to reap either honour or advantage from the relinquishment of your intended measures, and the renunciation of your supposed right. As I give not my name to the publick, you will have the satisfaction of yielding only to the force of my reasoning; and even if I were to reveal that name, I believe that some worthy persons among you would not be assauded of shewing some little deserence to the mere perfonal authority of the writer himself.

That writer is a lover of peace; and of liberty, too, he is a most ardent lover, because liberty* is the best mean by which real peace can be obtained and fecured. He therefore looks dpwn with fcorn upon every species of bigotry, and from every degree of perfecution he shrinks with horror -—He believes that, wherefover imperious and turbulent teachers have usurped an excessive ascendancy over the minds of an ignorant and headstrong multitude, religion will always be difgraced, morals always vitiated, and fociety always endangered. But the REAL interests, the REAL honour, the REAL AND MOST IMPORTANT cause of the eftablished Church, he ever bas supported, and will support, as he, also, ever has contended, and will contend, in favour of a liberal, efficient, and progressive toleration. He confounds not the want of confidence in the measures of an administration, with the want of respect for the principles of a government. He distinguishes between dutiful obedience, and abject fervility to that Regal power, which, in this country, he holds to be not only conducive, but effential, to the publick welfare. Heis not much in the habit of refigning his judgment to the fore bodings of the timid, the infinuations of the crafty, or the clamours of the malevolent--Yet he looks, perhaps, with no narrow line of forefight towards events which may be approaching, and upon the prefent fituation of the British empire, he cannot reflect without fervitutem plurimum intereft; pax eft tranquilla libertas.

Et nomen pacis dulce eft, et ipfa res falutaris; fed inter pecem
 CLERO Philippie II.

a pause—without a pang---without jealousy of every opinion, that may shake the fair fabrick of our constitution ---without abhorrence of every measure, that may deluge this land of freedom in blood.

In regard to yourselves, Gentlemen, he means to warn rather than to censure---The effect of that warning he configns to your own wisdom, and to the unsearchable will of that Providence, in submission to which he has ever found the most solid comfort. But in giving you that warning he has an entire considence in the purity of his motives: In enforcing it, he boldly appeals to the justness of his arguments: and upon concluding it, he is at this moment conscious of having discharged a most important duty, to you and your neighbours, to the Church and the State, to his country and his GOD.
